

The Middle Ages

A third of the people of England died during 1348-49 from the Black Death.

Most people both married and died young compared to nowadays - at about half the age at which people typically marry and die now.

A typical woman bore many children (five to ten was common) because only a few of them were likely to survive into adulthood and support the family when she was older.

