

What are Collective Rights

■ AFIRM: to validate and experiment to something

■ Collective rights are the rights that belong to groups of people and are entrenched (fixed) in Canada's constitution

- Collective rights are different from individual rights. Every Canadian citizen and permanent resident has individual rights. Collective rights are rights Canadians have for belonging to one of many groups in society.

Who has collective rights?

■ Aboriginal people including First Nations, Métis and Inuit.
Francophone and Anglophone

What are Collective Rights

- AFFIRM: to validate and express commitment to something
- Collective rights are the rights that belong to groups of people and are entrenched (fixed) in Canada's constitution
- Collective rights are different from individual rights. Every Canadian citizen and permanent resident has individual rights. Collective rights are rights Canadians have for belonging to one of many groups in society.

Who has collective rights?

- Aboriginal people including First Nations, Métis and Inuit. Francophone and Anglophone

What laws recognize the collective rights of First Nations peoples?
