

HealthConcarns

- Their health could put the health of Canadians at risk — for example, they have tuberculosis.

- They have a condition that could endanger public safety — for example, a mental disorder.

- Their health could put an “excessive demand” on Canada’s health services — for example, HIV/AIDS.

- None of these health requirements apply to people entering Canada as refugees or as family-class immigrants.

- Their health could put the health of Canadians at risk — for example, they have tuberculosis.
- They have a condition that could endanger public safety — for example, a mental disorder.
- Their health could put an “excessive demand” on Canada’s health services — for example, HIV/AIDS.
- None of these health requirements apply to people entering Canada as refugees or as family-class immigrants.

Health Concerns

- Enacted in 2002, the Immigration and Protection Act prevents people from coming to Canada if:
 - They're a spy
 - They're a terrorist
 - They have engaged in violent acts
- Why might this act have been passed in 2002?

Security Concerns
